

THE SOCIOLOGY OF ADDICTION

Thomas S. Weinberg

Sociology Department, Buffalo State College, USA

Keywords: drug abuse, alcoholism, addiction, sociological theory, sociological research, heroin, cocaine, alcohol, marihuana, deviant careers, drug subcultures, skid row, social control, rehabilitation

Contents

1. The Scope of the Field: Addictive and Non-Addictive Substances
 2. History of the Field
 3. Theoretical Perspectives and Research Methods in the Sociology of Addiction
 4. Studies of Careers in Drug and Alcohol Use and Abuse
 5. Studies of the effects of substance use and abuse on relationships and of relationships on substance use and abuse
 6. Studies of Drug and Alcohol Subcultures and Specific Populations
 7. Women and Substance Abuse
 8. Occupational Groups
 9. Heroin Subcultures
 10. Skid Row Subcultures
 11. Studies of Social Control Efforts
 12. Research on Punitive Responses to Drug and Alcohol Use and Abuse
 13. Studies of Rehabilitation Programs
 14. Conclusion
- Glossary
Bibliography
Biographical Sketch

Summary

Significant historical and contemporary contributions to the study of addiction, including those made by social anthropologists and other professionals, are examined through the perspective of sociological theory and research methods. The application of sociological theories and research methods to studies in the sociology of addiction is illustrated with specific examples. Emphasis is placed upon addiction as an interactive process marked by movement through a series of stages in a deviant career. A primary interest of this paper is the ways in which heroin addicts and alcoholics make sense of their substance use and changes in how they see themselves throughout this process. Similarities between narcotic and alcohol addicts in this process are noted. The ways in which substance abuse affects and is affected by interpersonal relationships, especially husband-wife and familial interaction, is reviewed. The use of narcotics among women, physicians and pharmacists is discussed. Ethnographic research on heroin and skid row subcultures is presented. The role of social control of substance abuse is examined, including research on the creation of laws controlling substance use and police responses. A number of rehabilitative approaches, including methadone maintenance, therapeutic communities, and innovative programs are examined.

1. The Scope of the Field: Addictive and Non-Addictive Substances

Traditionally, the Sociology of Addiction has been primarily concerned with the use of alcohol and the opiates. Since the 1970s, however, sociologists have turned their attention to other behaviors thought to be addictive such as tobacco use, overeating, gambling, shopping and, most recently, sex addiction. These other types of behaviors fit, in varying degrees, the definition of addiction first proposed by Alfred Lindesmith (1938). This discussion, however, will be limited to a review of the literature on drugs and alcohol. For Lindesmith, addiction had two components, a “mere physiological tolerance,” for which he used the term “habituated” and “addiction,” a term that “will be reserved for application to cases in which there is added to the physiological or pharmacological tolerance a psychic addiction which is marked by the appearance of an imperious desire for the drug and leads to the development of the other characteristic modes of behavior of the drug addict as he is known in our society (pp. 597-598).” Physiological (or pharmacological) tolerance refers to a process through which the individual needs increasing increments of a substance to experience the same effects he or she initially felt. At some point, however, the individual can no longer get the desired feeling no matter how much more of the substance is taken.

The sociology of addiction also includes the study of the use of substances such as marijuana (Becker, 1953) and the hallucinogens (Aaronson and Osmond, 1970) that do not fit Lindesmith’s criteria, as they do not produce a physiological tolerance. However, this research adds importantly to the literature and will therefore be included in this paper.

It should also be noted that not all work in the sociology of addiction has been done by sociologists. Important contributions have also been made by social anthropologists (e.g., Bourgois, 1995, 1998, 2003; Bourgois and Schonberg, 2009; Hoffer, 2006; La Barre, 1989). They will also be discussed in this entry.

2. History of the Field

An early attempt to explain addiction sociologically was that of Alfred Lindesmith (1938). He was responding to what he saw as the medical (and especially the psychiatric) profession’s view of addicts as “defective persons seeking to compensate for, or avoid, their inferiorities and mental conflicts” (1938: 594). An example of that perspective is included within Lindesmith’s article in a comment by David Slight of the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Chicago. Slight pointed out that because of either financial or practical purposes, addicts often seek a cure to reduce their tolerance. He also noted that drug addicts are often addicted to several drugs, and those they choose are dependent on availability. Addicts continue to take drugs, not out of fear of withdrawal, Slight asserted, but because they are seeking “some form of satisfaction or pleasure or relief from a state of emotional distress or difficulty of life” (p. 611).

Lindesmith proposed a more social psychological explanation. Addicts continue to use drugs, he noted, even after they can no longer experience euphoria, in order to avoid the symptoms of withdrawal. “Addiction begins,” he wrote, “when the person suffering from withdrawal symptoms realizes that a dose of the drug will dissipate all his discomfort and misery. If he then tries it out and actually feels the almost magical relief that he is afforded, he is on his way to confirmed addiction” (p. 599).

Lindesmith’s most significant contribution to the sociology of addiction lies in his application of George Herbert Mead’s emphasis on the important role of significant symbols in an individual’s construction of the self to an explanation of the process of becoming an addict. The shared meanings, by which his culture defines a “dope addict,” are learned by a person and applied to himself, “when the point is reached at which withdrawal symptoms intrude themselves upon the attention of the individual and compel him to go on using the drug” (p. 606). This idea foreshadowed the later work of Ray (1961-1962).

Ray examined the importance of an individual’s perception of the responses of others in the cycle of relapse and abstinence. “An episode of cure begins,” Ray writes, “in the private thoughts of the addict rather than in his overt behavior” (Ray, 1961-1962: 134). He or she begins to “call into question” his or her addict identity as the result of interactions with “important others” (p. 134). These interactions cause him or her to examine his or her present identity as addict.

Once the individual is abstinent he or she enters what Ray terms a “running struggle” period, a time of ambivalence, during which addicts attempt to deal with their social identities. The question they must resolve is whether they are more like non-addicts than addicts, and in this fragile state, they look toward non-addicts to ratify their new non-user identities. “The tendency toward relapse,” Ray notes, “develops out of the meanings of the abstainer’s experience in social situations when he develops an image of himself as socially different from non-addicts, and relapse occurs when he redefines himself as an addict” (p.137). Thus, Ray’s thesis is that “relapse is a function of the kind of objects ex-addicts make of themselves in the situations they face” (p. 138).

One of the earliest and most influential writers in the sociology of addiction was E. M. Jellinek. In a brief but important paper, Jellinek (1943) noted that while there was a large body of “sociological” literature available on alcoholism, “close analysis . . . reveals that the subject matter of the books and papers referred to is related to sociology but, with a few exceptions, does not report sociologic research in the strictest sense. . . They deal with subjects which are of interest to the sociologist, but they do not deal with them from the viewpoint of the sociologist, nor are they based on a utilization of his techniques” (p. 399). Jellinek observed that the literature on inebriety contains social case histories, which are a rich source of sociological source material along with writing on the folklore of drinking, but these data have rarely been systematically subjected to sociological analysis. He therefore called for the application of sociological frameworks in the study of alcoholism. The following section in this paper on Theoretical Perspectives and Research Methods in the Sociology of Addiction reviews research that employs sociological frameworks and analysis, as first suggested by Jellinek.

Jellinek’s sociological perspective appears in a number of articles. In one of these (Jellinek, 1962) he reported on a questionnaire study of more than two thousand drinking histories of male “alcohol addicts.” In that paper he made a distinction between two categories of alcoholics, “alcohol addicts” and “habitual symptomatic excessive drinkers.” The main difference between them is the loss of control over drinking, which occurs only for the alcohol addicts. It is this group for whom the disease conception of alcohol addiction is relevant. Jellinek sees this loss of control as “a disease condition per se which results from a process that superimposes itself upon those abnormal psychological conditions of which excessive drinking is a symptom” (p. 357).

From his analysis of drinking histories, Jellinek was able to reconstruct the usual career patterns of men who become alcohol addicts. These careers are characterized by movement through discernable phases. He is quick to point out, however, that not all the symptoms he identified fit all addicts. Nor did all of them follow the same phase sequence. Nevertheless, he asserted that his formulation holds for the “great majority” of addicts.

The first phase identified in the alcoholic addict’s career is the prealcoholic symptomatic phase. Jellinek notes that in the beginning, alcohol use is always socially motivated, whether or not the individual eventuates as an addict. However, the person who becomes either an alcohol addict or a habitual symptomatic excessive drinker soon discovers a sense of relief in drinking, which does not characterize the normal social drinker. Gradually the individual’s tolerance for alcohol increases. He has moved from the stage of occasional relief drinking to constant relief drinking.

The second stage in the alcoholic’s drinking career is the “prodromal phase,” during which blackouts are experienced. Jellinek refers to these experiences as “alcoholic palimpsests.” He notes specific behaviors that manifest themselves during this phase, including surreptitious drinking, preoccupation with alcohol, avid drinking, guilt feelings about drinking behavior, and avoiding reference to alcohol in conversation. Over time the alcoholic experiences more frequent palimpsests.

Jellinek calls the third stage “the crucial phase.” At this point the individual has lost control over his or her drinking. “Drinking of alcohol,” Jellinek writes, “starts a chain reaction which is felt by the drinker as a physical demand for alcohol” (p. 363). After a period of abstinence, the individual begins to drink again. Jellinek’s explanation for this is that the drinker is attempting to prove to himself that he can control his alcohol intake. Along with loss of control, the drinker begins to rationalize drinking to himself. In this phase, the individual experiences a loss of self-esteem and may engage in grandiose behavior as a way of compensating for these feelings. He begins to withdraw from others and to isolate himself. This is often accompanied by “marked aggressive behavior” (p. 364). At this point, he or she begins to experience guilt and “persistent remorse” (p. 364). Under social pressure, he or she may totally abstain from alcohol for periods of time. He or she may also attempt to change his or her drinking patterns to gain control. As his or her isolation deepens, the alcoholic begins to drop friends and quit jobs. His “entire behavior becomes alcohol centered” (p. 364). Additionally, the alcoholic loses interest in outside activities, reinterprets his or her interpersonal relationships, wallows in self-pity and may think about a “geographic escape” (p. 364). He or she may hide alcohol, neglect proper nutrition and begin drinking right after awakening. Jellinek notes that during this phase there may be a change in family interaction. The alcoholic’s spouse and children may withdraw from social activities to avoid embarrassment and what Goffman (1963) later called a “courtesy stigma,” or they may actually increase social involvement as a means of escaping a tense home environment.

The chronic phase is the fourth stage in the alcoholic's drinking career. By this time he is continually intoxicated for several days on end, which Jellinek refers to as "the onset of prolonged intoxications" (p. 366). The result of these episodes includes "marked ethical deterioration and impairment of thinking" (p. 366). The alcoholic may lose a tolerance for alcohol, experience persistent tremors and finally admit defeat in the battle against alcohol.

This chronology of the stages in the alcoholic career describes the "addictive alcoholic," who differs in important ways from the "nonaddictive alcoholic." The drinking of the latter does not show any clear-cut phases. Most importantly, he or she does not lose control even after many years of heavy drinking. Jellinek's model has been widely accepted among alcoholism researchers and the most influential typology of the addiction process. However, it has also been criticized in terms of the content of his phases (Rudy, 1986).

-
-
-

TO ACCESS ALL THE 30 PAGES OF THIS CHAPTER,
Visit: <http://www.desware.net/DESWARE-SampleAllChapter.aspx>

Bibliography

Aaronson, Bernard and Osmond, Humphry (1970). Psychedelics: The Uses and Implications of Hallucinogenic Drugs. Garden City (NY): Anchor Books. 512 pp. [An edited volume including first person accounts by the editors and other researchers of the effects of hallucinogens. Substances discussed include LSD, psilocybin, mescaline, yahe and peyote].

Anderson, Nels (1923). The Hobo: The Sociology of the Homeless Man. 296 pp. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. [An ethnographic study of the skid row subculture as it existed in the early 1920s, focusing on the various types of hobos, the problems they face, and how they solve those problems].

Bacon, Selden D. (1962). "Alcohol and Complex Society." Pp. 78-93 in David J. Pittman and Charles R. Snyder (eds.) Society Culture and Drinking Patterns. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [In this paper Bacon identifies the major attributes of a complex society, which distinguish it from a simpler society. He then considers the significance of social complexity for the part played by alcohol, both in the society as a whole and for the individual].

Bahr, Howard M. (1973). Skid Row: An Introduction to Disaffiliation. 335 pp. New York: Oxford University Press. [This book examines the vicious cycle of stigmatization, powerlessness and disaffiliation which affects the lives of homeless men].

Bales, Robert F. (1962). "Attitudes Toward Drinking in the Irish Culture." Pp. 157-187 in David J. Pittman and Charles R. Snyder (eds.) Society Culture and Drinking Patterns. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [This paper examines Irish drinking in historical perspective. Bales explains drinking as a way of symbolically certifying solidarity with others and as a utilitarian behavior used to gain personal advantage over others, or to bring relief or satisfaction of self-oriented, self-contained needs, as a medicine, to begin the day, to quiet hunger, to reward children, to relieve emotional difficulties, to facilitate sleep, and so forth].

Becker, Howard S. (1953). "Becoming a Marihuana User." American Journal of Sociology, 59: 235-242. [This symbolic interactionist article emphasizes the importance of social learning in the career of the marihuana smoker. Becker explains the importance of sense-making at each stage in the process of becoming a marihuana user.]

Becker, Howard S. (1963). Outsiders: Studies in the Sociology of Deviance. 215 pp. New York: The Free Press. [In this collection of his important essays, Becker, one of the preeminent thinkers in the field, develops his formulation of the sequential model of deviance. This volume includes his seminal article on becoming a marihuana user and expands upon his concept of moral career and examines labeling theory.]

Bittner, Egon (1967). "The Police on Skid Row: A Study of Peace Keeping." American Sociological Review. 32 (5): 699-715. [In this classic study, Bittner differentiates between two relatively distinct activities of police: law enforcement and keeping the peace. He describes how the latter activity, which is not determined by a clear legal mandate, is developed as a response to different demand conditions, such as the concentration of certain types of inhabitants of skid row.]

Bourgois, Philippe (2003) In Search of Respect: Selling Crack in El Barrio. 407 pp. New York: Cambridge University Press. [In this ethnography of crack dealers in Spanish Harlem in New York City, Bourgois discusses their marginalization from mainstream society. Through the friendships he cultivated among the inhabitants of East Harlem and his powerful analysis, Bourgois is able to present the situation of his respondents through their eyes.]

Bourgois, Philippe (1998a). "Just Another Night in a Shooting Gallery." Theory, Culture & Society. 15(2): 37-66. [In this fascinating and extremely well written paper, the author takes the reader on a tour of the night time routine of heroin addicts. He describes in vivid detail "copping" (e.g., acquiring drugs) in a New York City park and interaction in a "shooting gallery," an apartment in an abandoned building in which addicts inject heroin.]

Bourgois, Philippe (1998b). "The Moral Economies of Homeless Heroin Addicts: Confronting Ethnography, HIV Risk, and Everyday Violence in San Francisco Shooting Encampments." Substance Use & Misuse. 33(11): 2323-2351. [In this engaging ethnography of homeless heroin addicts in San Francisco, Bourgois documents the high risk behaviors engaged in by the people he studied. He explains that drug paraphernalia sharing among addicts and the "moral economy of dope fiends" along with their "fragile income generating strategies and tenuous social networks" (p. 2330) force them into risky practices.]

Bourgois, Philippe and Schonberg, Jeff (2009). Righteous Dopefiend. 359 pp. Berkeley: University of California Press. [This book represents over a decade of the authors' immersion in the social networks of homeless crack and heroin addicts on the streets of San Francisco. Bourgois and Schonberg document, with fieldnotes, conversations and photographs, the day to day survival techniques employed by these people living on the margins of society.]

Bullington, Bruce, Munns, John G., and Geis, Gilbert. (1969). "Purchase of Conformity: Ex-Narcotic Addicts Among the Bourgeoisie." Social Problems. 16 (4): 456-463. [This article reports on a sociological experiment in rehabilitation. Its unfortunate demise occurred when the direct supervisors of the recovering addict-street workers began putting them under cross pressures to maintain a streetwise style, thus undermining their attempts to validate their new nonaddict identity].

Dabney, Dean A. and Hollinger, Richard C., (2002). "Drugged Druggists: The Convergence of Two Criminal Career Trajectories." Justice Quarterly 1(1): 190-204. [A study, based on interviews obtained through snowball sampling, of the process by which two types of pharmacists, Recreational Abusers and Therapeutic Self-medicators, begin taking drugs and how they perceive themselves, others, and their own drug use].

Dole, Vincent P. and Nyswander Marie (1980). "Methadone Maintenance: A Theoretical Perspective." In Dan J. Lettieri, Mollie Sayers and Helen Wallenstein Pearson (eds.), Theories on Drug Abuse. National Institute on Drug Abuse. [The authors, who were the first to introduce Methadone Maintenance as a treatment for heroin addiction in the United States, discuss their program and its success.]

Durkheim, Emile (1966). Suicide, A Study in Sociology. New York: The Free Press. [First published in 1897, this volume illustrates how sociological theory explains what was up until that time thought to be a psychological issue. Durkheim found consistent variation among countries and groups in patterns of suicide, and he concluded that this was best explained by the presence or absence of norms that defined people's place in their society and their relationships to one another].

Gallihier, John F. and Walker, Allyn. (1977). "The Puzzle of the Social Origins of the Marihuana Tax Act of 1937." Social Problems: 24(3): 367-376. [This paper reviews contemporary studies on the origins of the Marihuana Tax Act of 1937 and finds that, using the same data, they come to differing conclusions. The authors argue that there is not enough evidence to conclude that the law was the result of efforts by the Federal Bureau of Narcotics to influence public opinion.]

Goffman, Erving (1959). "The moral career of the mental patient." Psychiatry: Journal for the Study of Interpersonal Processes. (22): 123-135. [This paper describes the process of becoming a hospitalized mental patient from the patient's perspective. Goffman notes that the prepatient often feels abandoned and betrayed by those whom he relies upon to be his advocate].

Goffman, Erving (1963). Stigma, Notes on the Management of Spoiled Identity. 147 pp. Englewood Cliffs (NJ): Prentice-Hall. [A classic treatise on stigmatization, especially from the point of view of those who are stigmatized. Goffman's work presents important insights into how stigmatized people cope with their situation].

Gomberg, Edith S. Lisansky and Nirenberg Ted D. (1993). Women and Substance Abuse. 387 pp. Norwood (NJ): Ablex Publishing. [This edited volume includes contributions on gender differences related to alcohol use, the use of illicit drugs, substance abuse by special populations of women, smoking and women, the relationship between eating disorders and substance abuse, prevention and treatment of alcohol and drug problems among women].

Hoffer, Lee D. (2006). Junkie Business: The Evolution and Operation of a Heroin Dealing Network. 116 pp. Thompson Wadsworth. [This ethnographic case study of two heroin addicts who become drug dealers describes in vivid detail the workings of the heroin subculture in Denver, Colorado. Hoffer examines how efforts at social control affect the strategies used by dealers in carrying out their business].

Inciardi, James A., Surratt, Hilary L., and Kurtz, Steven P. (2011). "African Americans, Crack, and the Federal Sentencing Guidelines. Pp. 252-263 in James A. Inciardi and Karen McElrath (eds.), The American Drug Scene, An Anthology. New York: Oxford University Press. [The authors of this paper note that the media misrepresents the complexity of the relationship between crack cocaine, crime and race. In an analysis of previously collected interview data from 699 cocaine users in Miami, Florida, Inciardi and his colleagues found a definite crack/crime connection, but only a very weak crack/black connection. They conclude that crack use does not differ substantially across ethnic groups, and that there are only a few ethnic differences in relation to the crack/crime connection, some of which are explained by socioeconomic differences.]

Jellinek, E. M. (1943). "Sociology and the Problems of Alcohol: An Introductory Note." Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol. 4: 399-401. [This paper is a call for the application of sociological perspectives to the study of alcohol. Jellinek noted that there was a large body of data on alcohol extant, which, though not sociological in the strict sense, could nevertheless be used for sociological analysis and insights].

Jellinek, E. M. (1962). "Phases of alcohol addiction." Pp. 356-368 in David J. Pittman and Charles R. Snyder (eds.) Society Culture and Drinking Patterns. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [In this paper Jellinek describes in detail the stages or phases in the alcoholic career of the "addicted alcoholic." This paper, although criticized by later writers, is notable for its attempt to characterize alcohol addiction as a social process, marked by various stages along the way to addiction].

La Barre, Weston. (1989). The Peyote Cult. (5th ed). 260 pp. Norman (OK): University of Oklahoma Press. [A pioneering study of the use of peyote by members of the Native American Church as part of their religious services. Editions of this book were used by tribes as a guide when they first adopted the peyote ritual.]

Lemert, Edwin M. (1967). Human Deviance, Social Problems, & Social Control. 211 pp. [This collection of the author's essays in the sociology of deviant behavior have a common concern: social control and its consequences for deviance. Professor Lemert introduces the concept of secondary deviance as arising from social control efforts]. Englewood Cliffs (NJ): Prentice-Hall.

Lindesmith, Alfred R. (1938). "A Sociological Theory of Drug Addiction." American Journal of Sociology. 43: 593-613. [In this seminal attempt to explain addiction from a sociological perspective, Lindesmith argues that continual opiate use is the result of the addict's desire to avoid the pain of drug withdrawal].

Lindesmith, Alfred R. (1940). "'Dope Fiend' Mythology." Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology (Jul/Aug1940) 31: 199-208. [In this article, Lindesmith discusses the public images of drug users and dealers. He debunks the stereotype of the drug user as dangerous and asserts that the greatest impact of the drug addict on society is economic.]

MacAndrew, Craig and Garfinkel, Harold (1962). "A Consideration of Changes Attributed to Intoxication as Common-Sense Reasons for Getting Drunk." Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol. 23:252-266. [The authors report on a study of 62 white men who appeared consecutively at an alcoholic outpatient clinic. They discovered that the men's image of their intoxicated self differed significantly from their sober and ideal self-images and that they imputed very negative attributes to their drunken self. This then posed the question of why these men become intoxicated. The authors use a social systems explanation to understand why men get drunk, noting that the drunken role frees intoxicated men from their usual societal expectations and obligations.]

MacAndrew, Craig and Edgerton, R. (1969). Drunken Comportment: A Social Explanation. 197 pp. Chicago: Aldine. [In this volume, the authors discuss the cultural norms for drunken behavior. They explain that a sociological interpretation of "drunken comportment" takes into account the cultural context in which it appears, which varies from group to group.]

Maher, Lisa and Daly, Kathleen (1996). "Women in the Street-Level Drug Economy: Continuity or Change?" Criminology 34: 465-491. [This paper reports on an ethnographic study of women drug users and their place in the drug economy in neighborhoods in Brooklyn, New York. The authors find that despite a greater presence of women in the street level drug economy and in low-level auxiliary roles, the drug market is monopolized by men and offers few stable income generating opportunities for women.]

Merton, Robert K. (1938). "Social Structure and Anomie." American Sociological Review. 3 (6): 672-682. [In one of the most important papers in sociological theory, criminology, and the sociology of deviant behavior, Merton explains deviance as the result of the inability of people in certain areas to access culturally approved means to attain appropriate success goals. This classic article has generated much debate and research in the sociology of deviant behavior and is still read and discussed seven decades after its publication.]

NIDA (2011). "Advances in Therapeutic Communities." Pp. 430-445 in James A. Inciardi and Karen McElrath (eds.), The American Drug Scene, An Anthology. New York: Oxford University Press. [This paper defines the concept and history of the "Therapeutic Community," (TC) including its essential elements and the criticisms of the TC movement. The author also details emerging trends and research in TCs and describes TCs for special populations.]

Pierce, Todd G. (1999). "Gen-X Junkie Ethnographic Research with Young White Heroin Users in Washington, D.C." Substance Use and Misuse 34: 2095-2114. [In this article, the author examines the social networks of young, white middle class heroin users, contrasting them with the networks of older African American users. He describes the formation, functioning and dissolution of these networks.]

Pittman, David J and Snyder, Charles R. (eds.) (1962),. Society Culture and Drinking Patterns. 616 pp. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [This edited volume was the definitive collection of research on alcohol of its time. Topics covered include drinking in anthropological perspective, social structure, subcultures and drinking patterns, religion and ethnicity, age and sex, drinking-centered institutions and groups, the genesis and patterning of alcoholism, and responsive movements and social control].

Preble, Edward and Casey, John J. (1969). "Taking Care of Business--The Heroin Addict's Life on the Street." The International Journal of the Addictions 4 (March): 10-24. [The authors review the history of heroin use in New York City from World War I through the 1960s. They discuss the various levels of drug distribution, "specialists" in the drug scene, and contend that rather than being passive, drug users are active members in the heroin scene, and this involvement creates purposeful lives for them.]

Ray, Marsh B. (1961-1962). "The Cycle of Abstinence and Relapse Among Heroin Addicts." Social Problems 9: 132-140. [In this article the author takes a symbolic interactionist approach to explaining the processes of abstinence and relapse for heroin addicts. He concludes that both of these processes depend upon the self-perceptions of the addict developed during interactions with others such as fellow addicts and nondrug users.]

Rettig, Richard P., Torres, Manuel J., and Garrett, Gerald R.,(1977). Manny, A Criminal Addict's Story. Boston: Houghton Mifflin. [This book is the autobiography of Manny Torres, who was a gang member and later a heroin addict. The book also contains an interview with Manny conducted by Richard Rettig, a chapter analyzing Manny's life story and a final chapter presenting an integrated theoretical perspective].

Rudy, David R. (1986), Becoming alcoholic: Alcoholics Anonymous and the reality of alcoholism. 173 pp. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [This ethnography provides a comprehensive analysis of the process of commitment to Alcoholics Anonymous]

Snyder, Charles R. (1962). "Culture and Sobriety: The Ingroup-Outgroup Factor." Pp. 188-225 in David J. Pittman and Charles R. Snyder (eds.) Society Culture and Drinking Patterns. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [In this paper the author explains the low rates of alcoholism and drinking pathologies among Jews in terms of the integration of drinking into traditional rituals of religious holidays, rites de passage, and observance of the Sabbath. This, and the definition of drinking as symbolic, communicative and expressive rather than convivial or hedonistic, learned during early socialization, serve to insulate Jews from alcohol-related problem behavior.]

Sommers, Ira, Baskin, Deborah R., and Fagan, Jeffrey (1994). "'Getting Out of the Life': Crime Desistance by Female Street Offenders." Deviant Behavior 15 (2): 125-149. [This article examines the processes through which 30 women, who had engaged in drug use, violent crime and deviant street subcultures and had renounced criminality for at least two years, had managed to do so. The authors address two main issues: the role of life events in triggering the cessation process and the relationship between cognitive and life situation changes in the desistance process.]

Spradley, James P. (1988). You Owe Yourself a Drunk: An Ethnography of Urban Nomads. 301 pp. New York: University Press of America. [Spradley's book describes the world of homeless, alcoholic men in an urban setting. He focuses on how these men are treated by agents and agencies of social control, presenting in great detail the work of police, courts, and jails].

The Buffalo News (2011). "Rx for Danger." March 20: 1A, 4A-5A. [A newspaper article, one of a several part series, that examines the use of and trafficking in narcotics nationwide in the U.S.]2

Trice, Harrison M. (1957). "A Study of the Process of Affiliation with A. A." Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol 18: 38-54. [In this paper, the author notes the conditions for successful affiliation with Alcoholics Anonymous. Among these factors are the willingness to share emotions, favorable hearsay about A.A., clear expectations about what the meetings are like, the provision of a sponsor, a positive effort on the part of the group to stay in contact with him, the ability to function in small, informal groups, lack of competition with A. A. from other sources, and support for his A. A. involvement from others close to him.]

Trice, Harrison M. and Roman, Paul M. (1970). "Delabeling, Relabeling, and Alcoholics Anonymous." Social Problems. 17, (4): 538-546. [In this paper the authors examine the factors contributing to the ex-addict's reintegration into society. They conclude that his acceptance and relabeling (as a recovering alcoholic) are facilitated by the availability of the reformed sinner role and societal attitudes toward alcoholism and knowledge of its causes, such as the disease concept of alcoholism popularized by Alcoholics Anonymous].

Tunnell, Kenneth D. (2005). "The OxyContin Epidemic and Crime Panic in Rural Kentucky." Contemporary Drug Problems. 32 (Summer): 225-258. [In this article, the author describes the use of OxyContin and its effects on rural communities. He contends that the crime panic he describes was socially constructed by the media and government sources and was not grounded in empirical reality.]

Ullman, Albert D. "First Drinking Experience as Related to Age and Sex." Pp. 259-266 in David J. Pittman and Charles R. Snyder (eds.) Society Culture and Drinking Patterns. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [This article first reviews research, primarily that of the author, on first drinking experiences of both institutionalized and college student populations. The author then reports on a study of male and female college students' first drinking experiences, finding that more men than women became somewhat intoxicated during their first drinking experience, women were more likely than men to have had their first drinking experiences at home with their parents, and that more women than men had their second drinking experiences in a matter of days or weeks after their first time using alcohol. He also found that social pressures were greater in motivating young women to drink than they were for young men, who gave more individual reasons.]

Weinberg, Thomas S. (1994). Gay Men, Drinking, and Alcoholism. 193 pp. Carbondale (IL): Southern Illinois University Press. [The volume is the definitive study of alcohol use in the gay male community. Topics covered include drinking as social behavior, the bar, love relationships and drinking, drinking careers, and types of drinkers. Alternative explanations for gay problem drinking are discussed, as well as suggestions for controlling alcohol abuse in the gay community].

Weinberg, Thomas S. and Vogler, Conrad C. (1990). "Wives of Alcoholics: Stigma Management and Adjustment to Husband-Wife Interaction." Deviant Behavior 11: 331-343. [This article, based on data collected from women participating in Al Anon (a support group for families of alcoholics) explores the complex relationships between women and their alcoholic husbands].

Winick, Charles (1961). "Physician Narcotic Addicts." Social Problems 9 (2): 174-186. [In this article the careers of physicians who became addicted to narcotics are examined. Their careers differ from that of the street addict in a number of ways, the drugs they use, the age at which they begin using drugs, their success in their field, their lack of a peer addict network and the consequences they face once they are caught.]

Wiseman, Jacqueline P. (1970). Stations of the Lost: The Treatment of Skid Row Alcoholics. 346 pp. Englewood Cliffs (NJ): Prentice-Hall. [Using a symbolic interactionist framework, Wiseman discusses the situation of men on skid row, including the role of police, the judicial screening process, jail, and rehabilitation efforts. She notes that these men have great difficulty staying sober because they lack the kind of support systems available to middle class alcoholics].

Yablonsky, Lewis. (1967). Synanon: The Tunnel Back. 403 pp. New York: MacMillan. [This book is an unabashedly partisan view of the Synanon program. Within a decade after the book was published, Synanon evolved into a cult controlled by founder Charles E. Dederich].

Biographical Sketch

Weinberg, T. S. received his bachelor's and master's degrees in sociology from Rutgers University and the Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Connecticut, the latter in 1977. He was a postdoctoral scholar on a National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism grant at the University of California, San Diego from 1979 to 1981. He is Professor of Sociology at Buffalo State College, State University of New York, where he has taught for 42 years. The recipient of the State University of New York Chancellor's Award for Excellence in Teaching, Dr. Weinberg teaches courses in the sociology of addiction, social psychology, contemporary sociological theory, the sociology of sexual behavior, the sociology of deviant behavior, group dynamics and introduction to sociology.

Dr. Weinberg is the author of Gay Men, Gay Selves: The Social Construction of Homosexual Identities (New York: Irvington Publishers, 1983), Gay Men, Drinking and Alcoholism (Carbondale, Illinois: The University of Southern Illinois Press, 1994), editor of S & M: Studies in Dominance and Submission (Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1995, also published as BDSM: Estudios sobre la dominacion y la sumision. Barcelona (Spain): edicions bellaterra, 2008.) and co-editor of S and M: Studies in Sodomasochism (Buffalo, N Y: Prometheus Books. 1983). He has contributed to several refereed journals, including the Journal of Drug Issues, Deviant Behavior, the Journal of Sex Research, the Journal of Homosexuality, the Bulletin of the American Academy of Psychiatry and the Law, Social Analysis, the journal of Psychology & Human Sexuality, and encyclopedias and edited volumes in the areas of addiction, sexuality, and deviant behavior. He is associate editor of Ethnographic Studies and Sexuality & Culture